THE TIRST NIGHT IN THE

TRENCHES. It so happened that one of our first nights n the trenches was that bitter one in the month of February, when Sir Colin Cambell's which the smoke escaped without the aid of proposed reconnaissance failed, owing to the a chimney. The walls were sometimes severity of the weather. The evening set in with a slight drizzle, with the wind from the south-west. Later on its violence increased. and it blew stiff enough to make us tremble for our tent-poles. Towards eleven o'clock the frost set in, and snow of the finest quality rapidly fell. Never either in America or elsewhere had such fine-grained snow been seen ... There was no escape, every crevice of our tents was penetrated, bed-covering, boots, and even the mattress received a surrounded by benches or stools, with a high- portion, and by the aid of the frost our blankets became like hard, useless boards. How devoutly did we wish for daylight! and when the day at last broke, we then first learned that an expedition had been out in such a pitiless night .- "Sebastopol Trenches," by Colonel Raynell Pack.
